

On Some Points in the Anatomy of the Liver of Man and Vertebrate Animals : With Directions for Injecting the Hepatic Ducts, and Making Preparations (Classic Reprint)

Lionel Smith Beale

Excerpt from On Some Points in the Anatomy of the Liver of Man and Vertebrate Animals: With Directions for Injecting the Hepatic Ducts, and Making Preparations It need hardly be said, that the great expense of illustrating his researches in the usual way would have precluded the author from bringing them forward in a separate form moreover, the sale of a Work like the present must necessarily be very small, as the subject only be interesting to a limited number of readers. Feeling the necessity of illustrations, he determined, to attempt, although against the advice of some, to take photographs of his drawings. For the success which has attended this effort he is mainly indebted to the assistance and encouragement he has received from several friends Who are interested in photography.
